It is believed that when a man dies his soul leaves the body, the body perishes, and the soul continues on its way. But what about things when they are no longer needed, ie what are things for if they are of no use? Specifically, these are Carpet Clapping / Dusting Frames, popularly called Gelenders, which, although inconspicuous, still exist and have been there for some time. Gelenders can be seen in many districts of Zagreb, but their purpose has long since disappeared. Gelender, once an integral part of the urban plan, is completely irrelevant today, but perhaps a new purpose can be added to it. Throughout history, monuments to deserving people or to the memory of a particular event have been erected. Carpet dusting frames reflect the spirit of times past, and declaring them monuments would ensure their future. The prototype of the monument found a place in front of Meštrović pavilion, and the project includes one official opening of the monument at the original location.
